The Asian Paints Ltd. daily candlestick chart shows significant price volatility over the past year. The stock started the period at around ₹2,400–₹2,500 and initially traded within a relatively narrow range. During November and December, the share price gained strong upward momentum and reached a yearly high near ₹3,000. This rise reflected strong buying interest and a positive market sentiment. However, after reaching the peak, the stock faced selling pressure, which resulted in a reversal in the price trend.

From January to April 2026, Asian Paints experienced a sharp correction, with the share price declining from approximately ₹2,900 to a low of around ₹2,100–₹2,200. The downward movement indicates strong selling pressure during this period. However, the stock found support near the ₹2,200 level and started recovering gradually. From April onwards, the stock showed a strong upward movement and recovered to around ₹2,700–₹2,800, indicating renewed buying interest. The increase in trading volume during major price movements also suggests active participation by investors.

Currently, Asian Paints is trading around ₹2,746 and appears to be in a consolidation phase after its recovery. The immediate support level is around ₹2,600–₹2,650, while the major resistance level is near ₹2,800. If the stock sustains above the support level and breaks above ₹2,800 with strong trading volume, it may indicate further upward momentum. On the other hand, a fall below ₹2,600 could result in renewed selling pressure. Overall, the technical outlook for Asian Paints appears neutral to moderately bullish, with the stock showing a strong recovery from its recent low levels.
